Learning good habits of visual and phonemic discrimination

Sight word practice is memorizing the appearance of a whole word, word study requires the student to see in it patterns and associate appropriate sounds with those patterns.

It is important for students to be able to manipulate the word cards in a sort so that they are taking responsibility for focusing on letter groups (vowel patterns).

Students should be engaging in activities where they are listening for whether the words grouped together make the same sounds.

Activities that extend the application of the student’s understanding of that pattern to other words that were not part of the sort also mark whether word knowledge is being internalized or if the student is just memorizing their spelling list.
